

Discounted Travel Vouchers for High-Ticket Sales

A customer-facing value-add your team can use after the core purchase makes sense - without immediately reducing the base price.

What it is	What it is not
A discounted travel voucher for an eligible purchase.	Cash, a price reduction, or a substitute for product value.
A defined offer with recipient terms and costs.	An undefined or misleading travel promise.
A selective closing and campaign tool.	A remedy for poor fit or unaffordability.

When to present it

Present the voucher after the buyer confirms fit and understands the core value, when timing or desire for added value is the genuine remaining issue. Confirm campaign eligibility first.

How to explain it

"For qualifying purchases during this campaign, we include a discounted travel voucher. May I show you exactly what it provides, what the recipient pays, and the applicable dates?"

What the customer must understand

- What travel value is discounted and what is included.
- What the recipient pays or remains responsible for.
- Eligibility, reservation or redemption steps, restrictions, and deadlines.
- Where to find complete terms and recipient support.

What managers should measure

Track qualified close rate, discount frequency, average order value, gross profit, cycle time, cancellations, voucher presentation and issuance, attributable revenue, and commission.

Manager rule: If the purchase does not make sense without the promotion, keep working on fit and value or stop. Do not use the voucher to overpower a legitimate concern.
